

First Week

During the enrollment, when I first saw that we have PROGCON in our subjects, I wonder how I would get through with this subject because as far as knew, programming is something “na pinag pupuyatan” and something that would eat a lot of your time before you would get the result that you wanted. And so I ask my colleagues whose courses are in lined with IT; what to expect in PROGCON subject, then they just tell me to not make fun of it otherwise it should be taken seriously as possible because coding don’t have that redo and undo to change things as quick as what you wanted because if you make a mistake, you’ll re-work it from the beginning or if not, you’ll find what’s wrong and go back to where you started. It wouldn’t also be also perfect as what you wished for in just a snap of your fingers because you need to work hard on this and try & try until you succeed and be satisfied to the outcome of your work.

PROGCON is not my thing but with how our professor handle students, I think this subject would be one of my favorite subjects as well as the professor. During the first week, I thought things might get though and lessons would be delivered right away. But I’m wrong, during the first week things just came chill as what students wanted and fun as what everyone doesn’t expected. It’s good that it’s not the subject itself that provides an impression to us but rather than the professor herself because professor’s behavior to the students is one of the factors how students will go through and will work with the given subject.

Overall, I don’t see any negative of some room for improvement because it was perfect. The way the course had started, everything just went smooth and fun. And after the time ends, it’s also fun! I love how the professor handles her students genuinely, purely and with empathy. It was great and amazing to be here in this class.
